

About Our Organization

The Department of the Navy (DON) is more than ships, airplanes, sailors and marines. It has almost 190,000 civilians at Naval and Marine Corps activities throughout the world. Civilian employees provide the critical infrastructure needed to support the DON mission. The range of jobs and skills are as diverse as the people who fill the positions. From scientific research to supporting the families of the men and women who serve. Civilian employees perform a range of services similar to those services required to run a city.

The focus of the Department has changed from preparing to fight a global conventional war to maintaining the operational flexibility and forward naval presence to handle selective crisis-response missions. A critical key to success has not changed. Attracting, training and retaining a highly skilled workforce is the most important role that the Civilian Human Resources fill in supporting that mission.

Together the Human Resources community, managers, and military and civilian workforce partner to ensure that the right people are in the right place at the right time to support the mission of the Department.
